

Communication:

It's Not Just About What You Say Anymore¹

Summary: Communication is the key to any successful project, relationship, business, or group. However, communication is often convoluted, disjointed, or not there at all. This can ultimately compromise the success of the group or team. Businesses, organizations, and groups cannot afford for communication to breakdown and any successful team recognizes the importance of effective communication and taking the time as a group to address communication pitfalls. The Utility Players can help teams, groups, and individuals improve their ability to successfully communicate ideas and plans.

Through a wide variety of improv exercises and games, the Utility Players will demonstrate how participants can actively listen to their teammates and respond clearly, effectively, and succinctly. The Utility Players will also outline that communication is no longer confined to just what one says, but instead extends to long litany of items including tone, body positioning, and gesturing. These examples can be just as important as the words that you choose to use when communicating with an individual and all must be kept in mind.

This is unlike any other communication workshop you have taken. Improv will comfortably challenge individuals but also actively engage participants through games and demonstrate the importance of communication through these games instead of a lecture on the importance of communication. So looking for a solution to some of the communication issues your group is experiencing and want to address them in a space that is welcoming and hilarious at the same time – then book the Utility Players and experience a workshop unlike others that you have seen. Email theutilityplayers@gmail.com for more information about this class and how it can benefit both individuals and groups.

¹ All classes are taught by Jessica Levity, Producer of the Utility Players and Executive Director of Homeslice Productions [www.homesliceproductions.com]. If you would like more information about the Utility Players and the trainings they offer check out our website at www.utilityplayerscomedy.com